

ABSTRACT

A semiconductor device comprises two transistors where a gate electrode of one transistor and source or drain of another transistor are located in the same rail. A monolithic three dimensional array contains a plurality of such devices. The transistors in different levels of the array preferably have a different orientation.